What about motion that is too slow to be seen by the human eye? That problem has been solved by the use of the time-lapse camera. In this one, the shutter is geared to take only one shot per second, or one per minute, or even per hour — depending upon the kind of movement that is being photographed. When the time-lapse film is projected at the normal speed of twenty-four pictures per second, it is possible to see a bean sprout growing up out of the ground. Time-lapse films are useful in the study of many types of motion too slow to be observed by the unaided, human eye.

Do we really have the best university programs? Perhaps. But every educator would add or subtract a few subjects. [49~50] 다음 글을 읽고 물음에 답하십시오.

Many people think of crisis as being connected only with unhappy events. “This is not the case,” argued John. “There are the expected, maturational crises we experience at times of life development and change. Some examples are a child’s first enrollment in school or his transfer at a later age to a new school, marriage, or election to public office. These events may hasten the occurrence of a crisis — both for the youngster and his parents.”

“But there is also an unexpected kind of crisis,” added Mary. “This can stem from many sources such as having an automobile crash, being fired from a job, falling suddenly ill, becoming involved in a legal suit, or losing a large sum of money. Severe illness will create a crisis not only for the individual concerned but also for his family. And an illness may itself be caused by an emotional crisis like the death of parents.”
